Today, in Mieko's English class at school, her teacher James said to the students, "When I came to Japan, I didn't know any Japanese. But now I can write all of your names in hiragana."

Mieko said, "Great! I think you have studied a new language very hard, just like my grandfather. He studies English every day. I want you to meet him some day."

Seven years ago, Mieko's grandfather was sixty years old and stopped working. He remembered his old school days, and wanted to study English again. So he bought a few dictionaries, a diary, and the textbook for an English conversation program on television. At first he could only write a little English in his diary. But he wrote every day, and watched the English conversation program every week.

A few months later, one evening, he said happily to Mieko, "Today I ①(speak) English with a foreigner on the street. I told her the way to the museum, and she ②(understand) me."

He still writes in his diary, enjoys the English conversation program, and sometimes shows foreigners around town.
